1. Platformization

Platformization refers to the penetration of the infrastructures, economic processes and governance frameworks of digital platforms into different sectors of society. This point is developed further on page 1 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

News organisations increasingly depend on platforms for distribution, which shifts power over visibility from editors to platform companies. This point is developed further on page 1 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Agenda setting is the process by which news coverage influences which issues the public considers important. This point is developed further on page 1 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Platformization refers to the penetration of the infrastructures, economic processes and governance frameworks of digital platforms into different sectors of society. This point is developed further on page 1 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Algorithmic curation is the automated ranking and filtering of content by software. This point is developed further on page 2 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Unlike editorial gatekeeping, algorithmic curation is optimised for signals such as engagement, and its criteria are rarely transparent. This point is developed further on page 2 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Framing is the selection and emphasis of certain aspects of an issue to promote a particular interpretation. This point is developed further on page 2 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Algorithmic curation is the automated ranking and filtering of content by software. This point is developed further on page 2 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Gatekeeping is the process by which editors and journalists select which events become news. This point is developed further on page 3 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

David Manning White (1950) studied how a wire editor chose stories for publication. This point is developed further on page 3 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Priming is the effect by which media coverage makes some criteria more salient when people evaluate leaders. This point is developed further on page 3 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Gatekeeping is the process by which editors and journalists select which events become news. This point is developed further on page 3 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

2. Mediatization

Mediatization is the process through which media increasingly shape institutions, practices and social interaction. This point is developed further on page 4 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Political communication changes because parties adapt their messages to media logic. This point is developed further on page 4 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Filter bubble is a state of informational isolation produced by personalised recommendation systems. This point is developed further on page 4 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Mediatization is the process through which media increasingly shape institutions, practices and social interaction. This point is developed further on page 4 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Media accountability is the set of processes through which media organisations answer to the public for their conduct. This point is developed further on page 5 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Traditional accountability theory often assumes Western institutional structures and overlooks hybrid media environments. This point is developed further on page 5 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Echo chamber is an environment in which people encounter only beliefs that amplify their own. This point is developed further on page 5 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Media accountability is the set of processes through which media organisations answer to the public for their conduct. This point is developed further on page 5 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Platformization refers to the penetration of the infrastructures, economic processes and governance frameworks of digital platforms into different sectors of society. This point is developed further on page 6 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

News organisations increasingly depend on platforms for distribution, which shifts power over visibility from editors to platform companies. This point is developed further on page 6 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Network effects is the increase in a platform's value as more users join it. This point is developed further on page 6 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Platformization refers to the penetration of the infrastructures, economic processes and governance frameworks of digital platforms into different sectors of society. This point is developed further on page 6 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

3. Algorithmic curation

Algorithmic curation is the automated ranking and filtering of content by software. This point is developed further on page 7 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Unlike editorial gatekeeping, algorithmic curation is optimised for signals such as engagement, and its criteria are rarely transparent. This point is developed further on page 7 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Datafication is the transformation of social action into quantified data that can be tracked and analysed. This point is developed further on page 7 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Algorithmic curation is the automated ranking and filtering of content by software. This point is developed further on page 7 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Gatekeeping is the process by which editors and journalists select which events become news. This point is developed further on page 8 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

David Manning White (1950) studied how a wire editor chose stories for publication. This point is developed further on page 8 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Surveillance capitalism is an economic logic that turns behavioural data into predictions sold to advertisers. This point is developed further on page 8 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.

Gatekeeping is the process by which editors and journalists select which events become news. This point is developed further on page 8 with examples from contemporary media systems and the debates they have generated among scholars.